

Shopping & Style

Edited by Rachel LeWinter • style@timeoutny.com

"This I could wear on my way to practice," Lundqvist declares of this water- and wind-resistant jacket, fashioned from tent fabric. "A lot of the guys wear T-shirts and sweatpants and they'll ask me, 'Where are you going after practice?' I tell them, nowhere! I just don't like to wear sweatpants."

◀ Fjällräven Oban jacket, $299, at Fjällräven, 262 Mott St between E Houston and Prince Sts (212-226-7846, fjallraven.us)

"I like small details," says Lundqvist, noting the pop of color on the shoulder of this running shirt. And there are plenty of nuances to appreciate about the garment: For one, that vibrant strip is actually reflective piping.

There's also a pocket on the back for stashing money or an ID, and a loop in the neckline for stringing your iPod cord through. "This is good for when I'm lifting at the gym," assesses Lundqvist. "It's got good stretch."

Icebreaker Ace long-sleeved crew-neck shirt, $80, at Icebreaker, 102 Wooster St between Prince and Spring Sts (646-861-2523, icebreaker.com)

Rummaging with... Henrik Lundqvist

The normally dapper New York Rangers goalie steps outside his sartorial comfort zone to shop for sporty activewear. By Cristina Velocci Photographs by David Rosenzweig

For a professional athlete, Henrik Lundqvist spends hardly any time in active apparel: When he's not in the rink, the Swedish ice-hockey player estimates that he wears a suit four to five days a week. "When we travel with the team, we always wear suits," he explains. "It's probably what I feel most comfortable in." Even more surprising, when he arrives straight from practice wearing a polished Atlas button-up shirt, Reiss khaki shorts and midtop Nike sneakers he claims, "Well, today I'm not that dressy." Can someone get this guy a sweatshirt? With the Rangers' 2011 preseason kicking off on Wednesday 21 (the team will play the New Jersey Devils in Albany, New York), we decided it was as good a time as any to ease the ice king into some more casual, sporty threads.

"Even though I'm not that great of a tennis player, I try to look like a tennis player so I have a mental advantage when I show up," says Lundqvist, who favors traditional whites on the court. "Normally, I like to wear a three-button polo, but I could play tennis in a shirt like this; the shoulders are more free, so it's easier to serve."

Equinox Orange Label Active sleeveless crew tank, $58, at the Shop at Equinox, 568 Broadway at Prince St (212-334-4631, equinox.com)

"A lot of Swedes have these socks," says Lundqvist. "Back home, you'll see people in black suits wearing red, pink or blue socks, and they [cuff their pants] to show them off." Though the Stockholm label is best known for its wildly patterned pairs, Lundqvist would rather slip into the trend with one of these subtle, striped options. "Those are too crazy," he admits after surveying the display. "I haven't gotten there yet!"

Happy Socks thin striped socks, $12, at Tretorn, 150 Spring St between West Broadway and Wooster St (646-454-9680, store.tretorn.com)

One of the first things Lundqvist picks up at outdoor clothing store Patagonia is this rugged plaid button-up shirt. "Where I grew up [in Are, Sweden], it's big down south to go mountain biking and climbing," he says. "I would probably wear this hiking, but that will never happen," he admits with a laugh. "I hike in the city by walking around—that's my hike." Instead, he envisions wearing the top with jeans and boots for an urban stroll.

Patagonia men's long-sleeved pima cotton shirt, $75, at Patagonia, 101 Wooster St between Prince and Spring Sts (212-343-1776, patagonia.com)